34. In the case of Rodney King, four LA police officers were eventually tried on charges of using excessive force, but none were convicted. Two of the officers were later found guilty of federal civil rights violations. Just your best guess -- if this happened today, would the police officers be more likely to have been convicted of using excessive force, or less likely, or would it not be any different?

34. In the case of Rodney King, four LA police officers were eventually tried on charges of using excessive force, but none were convicted. Two of the officers were later found guilty of federal civil rights violations. Just your best guess -- if this happened today, would the police officers be more likely to have been convicted of using excessive force, or less likely, or would it not be any different?

34. In the case of Rodney King, four LA police officers were eventually tried on charges of using excessive force, but none were convicted. Two of the officers were later found guilty of federal civil rights violations. Just your best guess -- if this happened today, would the police officers be more likely to have been convicted of using excessive force, or less likely, or would it not be any different?

34. In the case of Rodney King, four LA police officers were eventually tried on charges of using excessive force, but none were convicted. Two of the officers were later found guilty of federal civil rights violations. Just your best guess -- if this happened today, would the police officers be more likely to have been convicted of using excessive force, or less likely, or would it not be any different?

34. In the case of Rodney King, four LA police officers were eventually tried on charges of using excessive force, but none were convicted. Two of the officers were later found guilty of federal civil rights violations. Just your best guess -- if this happened today, would the police officers be more likely to have been convicted of using excessive force, or less likely, or would it not be any different?
